S

S, s, indecl. n. or f. I. The nineteenth letter of the Latin alphabet, corresponding in form to the old Greek S for Σ. H. As an initial and medial s has a hard sound, and is therefore joined only with the tenses (c, p, t).—As a medial, also written double after long vowels: caussa, cassus, divisiones (so wrote, for instance, Cicero and Virgil, acc. to Quint.). III. As a final, s has a softer sound, and therefore not only admitted the medial b before it (plebs, urbs, abs; Arabs, chalybs, etc.), but often entirely disappeared. So in the ante-class. poets down to the early years of Cicero (and also in his own poem, entitled Aratus, written in his youth), before words beginning with a consonant, to avoid position: Rabi Romulus, Fulvii Nobilior, gravi Terra, est salvi bella, Iliperionii cursum, Virgine nam sibi, etc.; less freq. before words beginning with a vowel, in which case, to avoid hiatus, the vowel before s was also elided; vas argenteis for vasis argenteus.—Final s is also elided (and the preceding vowel either dropped with it or weakened) in the forms sat from satis; mage from magis; in the neut. forms of adjectives of the 3d declension, ære, agreste, facile; in the collateral forms of the 2d Pers. Sing. Pass. fateri, fateare, faterare, etc.; in the Gen. Sing. of the 1st, 3d, and 5th declension, and in the Nom. Plur. of the 1st and 2d declension (aurai for aurais, analog. to regis, etc.).—Lastly, s disappears in the forms, abin', scin', viden', satin', from abisne, scisne, vident', esne, saisne, etc. IV. S appears as an equivalent for the aspirate in many words of Greek origin; semi-, serpo, ser, super, corresp. to ἡμι-, ἑρπω, ἑρ, ὑπερ, etc.—It is also prefixed to some words obtained from Greek originals which take the soft breathing: si (old form sei), sero, Segesta, corresp. to εἰ, ἑρῶ (whence εἶπω), ἑρῆστρα.—Less freq. in radical words beginning with a consonant: sculpo corresp. to γράφω; scribo, to γράφω.—To soften the termination, s appears in abs, = ab, and ær corresp. to ἑκ.—Sometimes, on the contrary, an initial σ appears in Greek, where the corresponding Latin word has not taken the s: Lat. fallo, Gr. σφάλω. V. S is interchanged: A. Most freq. with r; see that letter, no. II.—B. With d: Claudius, from the Sabine Clausus; and, on the other hand, rosa, corresp. to the Gr. ῥόδον.—C. With t: tensus and lentus: resina corresp. to ῥητίνη; and, on the contrary, merare, puttare, for mersare, pulsare. VI. S is assimilated before f in the compounds of dis: differo, diffucilis, diffuso, etc.; v. 3. dis.—On the other hand, it arises by assimilation from d, in assum, assimo, cessi, for adsum, adsumo, cessi-si; from t in fassus, from futeor; from b in jussi, from juvæ; from m in pressi, from premo; from r in gessi, from gero; and dussuri, from dorsum. VII. As an abbreviation, S denotes sacrum, semis, sis; S. C., senatusconsultum; S. P., sua pecuniâ; S. P. Q. R., Senatus Populique Romanus, etc.

V, v, n. indecl., or f., the twenty-second letter of the Latin alphabet. The character is derived from the Greek Υ. Although it was originally written with the same sign as the vowel u, it was by the ancients themselves considered as essentially different from it. I. In sound V corresponds to the Æolic digamma; hence, it is called in Quintilian, Æolica littera. By this affinity of the v to the digamma is explained the frequent occurrence of an initial or medial v in Latin words whose Greek equivalents have an initial or medial vowel; cf., ver, ῥῶ; vis, τῆς; levis, ἁλῆος. II. V has the closest affinity to the vowel u, and hence, in the course of composition and inflection, it often passed into the latter: solvo, solum, caveo, cautum, etc. III. V as a medial between two vowels was very frequently elided, and the word underwent a greater or less contraction: amavisti, amāsti; novisti, nōsti; si vis, sis. IV. The designation of the number five by the letter V does not strictly belong here, it being rather a representation of the half of X.

Less frequently x has arisen from the combinations ps and ts: proximus for prop-simus (from prope), nixus for nit-sus (from nitor), the latter being used along with the collateral form nixus, as also connixi with connixi, and mistus (from misceo)

Y, y, n. indecl. or f.: A Greek letter (the twenty-fourth of the Latin Alphabet), which was introduced only at a late period into the Latin orthography for words borrowed from the Gr.:—the place of the Gr. Y being previously filled by U. Thus, according to the express testimony of Cicero, Ennius always wrote Burrus for Pyrrhus, and Bruges for Phryges; and so the borrowed words belonging to the oldest period of the formation of the language have either constantly preserved u for the Greek y, as cubus from κύβος, mus from μῦς, etc.; or this y has afterwards changed into i, as lacrima, formerly lacryma, from δάκρυμα. Sometimes, also, o took the place of the y, as sorex from ῥαξ, folium from φύλλον, and, shortening a long vowel, ancora from ἄγκυρα, like the preceding lacrima from δάκρυμα. In Cicero's time y seems to have been already in use; but its application was restricted to foreign words, and hence the spellings Sylla, Tybris, pyrum, satyra, etc., are to be rejected.
